The Redeemer bears the distinction of being the only class of spacecraft officially sanctioned by the reverend Sverde, who, when presented with its initial designs 45 years ago, said that prayer had revealed to her that that this was to be the "shepherds crook" by which man's sins would be constrained. Inexpensive, even at the time of its introduction, the Redeemer remains a utilitarian craft well suited to the production schedules of backwater worlds.}

Why aliens have ships with human names
(or, “What happened to the old Rlaan and Aera Ships?”)

- There are a pair of prime reasons:
- A) The species is a current or former client of Humanity as in the case of the Dgn, Klk’k, Mishtali, Purth, and Shmrn. (It should be noted that the Klk’k, being reasonably capable of emulating most human speech, actually refer to their ships by the listed names, which they are themselves responsible for choosing. This is only one of several reasons that the Klk’k have a well deserved reputation for having an odd sense of humor.)
 - B) Normal Humans can’t do a reasonable job of even beginning to emulate many alien languages. As such, humanity has assigned a naming scheme to the ships constructed by that species. This is the case with the Aera, Rlaan (and their clients), and Uln. (The Ancients and TWHON are ignored here) These species have their own naming schemes for their own vessels and those of other species – however, attempting to represent them is a rather pointless task at this point. (Does this imply that something may likely be done about the naming scheme for alien systems? Maybe someday)

As to what, specifically, happened to the old names for the Aera and Rlaan, the Rlaan were found to be using a Norse name set, which really did not at all suit them (and it also conflicted with other uses of Norse name sets), and the Aera had no name scheme whatsoever. The Uln had no scheme as well, but also had no ships, so it was a moot point. This has been remedied.

Q: Why don’t the installations have a naming scheme too?
A: Because then you wouldn’t know what the heck they did – and while finding out, at your leisure, what role a particular alien ship fills may be fun and amusing – not knowing where to dock is more likely just annoying. Likewise, I don't feel it detracts overly that the generic orbital docking platforms are called "orbital docking platforms" or the mining bases "mining bases" whereas having every fighter called "Faction X Fighter" for various values of Faction X, would be somewhat sub-optimal.

How definitive is this list?

Everything on this list has a place in my present conception of the Vegastrike Universe.

Though it does contain several orbit→ ground/ground→orbit shuttles, drop craft, assault shuttles and such, I have not made any particular effort to do for planetary and ground-only units and structures what I am trying to do for the space installations and vessels in terms of completeness.

There are other things in the Vegastrike Universe that are not in this list; that is, the list is not only incomplete, it is known to be incomplete, with a few particular omissions being, at this point, intentional due to the thoughts behind them not being fully complete.

More craft and installations will certainly be added, because I'm sure there exist things I've forgotten, neglected, or lacked the imagination to come up with that would be useful to expand the vibrancy of the VS universe.

Species and factions are much more likely to remain stable, albeit some of the factions may undergo 'name makeovers'. Any new species that did get added would have to either be A) Created by one of the existing bio-wise species, B) Found in a star system not in the jump network (there are several implications there) or C) Found in the jump network due to core-ward exploration by either the Humans or Rlaan. I am reluctant to consider the prospect of wild proliferation of the Vegastrike set of sophont specie. I've a warm place in my heart for Star Trek, but the Vegastrike Universe isn't the sort of place where sentient (let alone humanoid – although one does give them some leeway for having to have actors play the aliens on a limited budget) life forms are popping out from under every rock. Even as it is, I think it will be a struggle to make all of the different aliens sufficiently alien in nature.
